Slowly row, ahl slowly row
Along the lonely river:
See, dpon the banks below
The golden sunbeam quiver!
Look your last, ere they are past, For long ere our returning, We'll pine in vain but once again, To see the sunlight burning, O'er the land where we were born

Slowly row, ah! slowly row, Along the silver raver; See, from yonder rustic bridge. Snowy 'kerchiefs quiver! Fesst your eyes before it flies, That picture so endearing, For grass may start o'er each fond heart Ere we again are nearing The land where we were born.

Slowly row, ah! slowly row, Bank and bridge retreating; Through a huze of tears we gaze On the visions fleeting. Brightereyes and bluer skies

May greet us on the morrow, But the il only make our fond hearts ache, For those we leave in sorrow In the land where we were born.

The Capacities of our State-Its Sources of Wealth.

Nothing so strikingly exhibits the solidity and stability of the basis of which the industrial system of our State rests, and the comparative exemption of that system from the effects of periodical revulsions, as the steady appreciation of the value of our ferming lands. Our interests have not entirely escaped the visitation which in 1857 paralized trade, and whose lingering presence is yet to be seen in the partial stagnation in the disjointed condition of the commercial machinery of the country, and in the reluctance of timid capital to encourage enterprise. But the influence of that visitation was mild in Missouri, compared with its effects in other Western States; and while it checked, it could not, and did not, while the price of farming lands in Illinois and Iowa is far below the high standard it adjacent market, consisting in part as follows: had reached in '57, farming lands in Missouri are worth wore, and sell for more, than even in that year of high figures; and our fermers, instead of being disheartened and dispirited by unprofitable operations, and fettered by mortgages and accumulated debts, are presperous, contented and happy.
